

A proposal

Introduction

ITMO University is a wonderful institution of higher education that can truly be called non-classical. Despite this, a huge problem arose with students attending classes. The aim of this proposal is to suggest a number of changes that will solve the problem of attendance.

Changes in soft-skills classes

It's no secret that ITMO has a huge workload, so students have very little time to rest. They often say that in addition to their professional disciplines, a lot of time is spent on their minors: subjects related to soft-skills and general development. For this reason, we suggest reducing the amount of minors homework; this will free up some time for relaxation and students will be more willing to attend classes.

Class start offset

Classes starting at 8:20am force students live far from ITMO to wake up 5-6am, after which students feel very lethargic and tired. A solution to this could be to shift pairs for an hour or two, then students will have more strength and desire to study.

Dining room

At ITMO there are no long breaks for lunch, so students often choose to go to the university cafeteria for a snack. Prices there have risen significantly, which greatly affects the student's budget. Therefore, it is worth either lowering prices in the canteen, or creating a lunch break during which you can eat outside the university.

Conclusion

To summarize, these changes will improve the lives of students and increase class attendance because they address the major problems students face.
